Ἅπαξ λεγόμενα of Plato

The Platonic question in spite of numerous methods and attempts remains almost as unsettled as ever. In the general wreck of all theories concerning the succession of the dialogues Teichmüller and Dittenberger are trying to establish a few points of departure. The one makes the advance in dramatic representation the point where the later dialogues seperate from the earlier; the other shows a widely different use of μήν supposed to mark the visit to Sicily. Highly interesting as are both these plans of work, the results based on the allowance or non-allowance of expressions introducing the speakers or on the behavior of a single particle are dependent on too capricious conditions to yield certain conclusions and are only valuable when found to work in harmony with other lines of criteria. The developement of ideas has been tried in the different dialogues without settling the controversy. Now linguistic tests have been brought into the field. In spite of all drawbacks the advance has been made in the right direction.

[illegible]

The object in all linguistic tests should be to get behind the consciousness of the author and thus take him off his guard. Those peculiarities ought to be watched which would escape his notice or such characteristics as he could not avoid. In spite of the most varied forms of composition there must be something so genuinely Platonic as not to have been noticed by Plato. If we can seize on some peculiarity of this nature and run it through all the dialogues significant results must follow. While Teichmüller and Dittenberger are in different ways working out the genuineness and order of the dialogues the ἅπαξ λεγόμενα [illegible] perhaps it could afford some data available in the Platonic question. Seeing the success that has attended Dittenberger's categories of [illegible] the same method has been attempted on a larger scale.

The Σύνδεσμοι has been selected and separated into classes. The apparatus for the study [illegible] such forms so rare in the dialogues that this part forms an insignificant feature of our work. A more important attempt has been the division of prose and poetry. All ancient authorities agree in assigning to Plato a style midway between prose and poetry and an endeavor has been made to discover [illegible]

This will in some measure show by the statistical method how closely the linguistic feeling of Aristotle or Dionysius of Halicarnassus is supported by facts. What they felt instinctively we must arrive at by minute study. The importance of making a distinction [illegible] is evident to all. In English we have a large poetical vocabulary side by side with our prose language. Every trade has to a greater or less extent a speech of its own. There is a nautical and a military phraseology and occasionally we can detect a lawyer or a minister or a doctor by his use of words. That the departments of language were as keenly felt in Greek is apparent to every reader of Aristophanes, where the epic lyric, tragic or oracular language is mimicked with abundant success. Who can doubt that in a language where even the slight peculiarities of Euripides could be immediately perceived and appreciated there could be no feeling for the great departments? No doubt the allusions to Homer could be caught as readily as we understand a reference to the Bible. Considering the necessity of understanding this subtle play of our author, we have endeavored to draw the distinction between the prose and poetry of the words under consideration. The principles for determining what is prose or not are so often crossed, that it is of no practical importance to give general rules. Every instance must be examined by itself. There are words which occur only in the poets and yet they are not poetical and vice versa. The glossaries cannot be trusted in every case. Whatever the attitude of Xenophon towards syntax his vocabulary is doubtful. The Attic orators must be the standard and yet Isocrates and Antiphon cannot always be depended upon. The Lexiphanes of Lucian and the parodies of Aristophanes

The poetical and the vulgar speech often coincide and here the comedies of Aristophanes have been of great service. The poetical part of the ἅπαξ εἰρημένα leaving the quotations out of account is a little more than one sixteenth. If our selection of words is a fair representation of Plato's entire vocabulary this would give the relation of prose to poetry. To ascertain how much he comes to the language of poetry it would be necessary to examine the language of the tragic poets to discover how large a quantity of poetic vocabulary they employ in their diction.

We shall briefly summarize a few of the results gained from the arrangement of our categories. Starting with a large number of categories we found at the close of the work that some contained only so few instances that no reliable conclusions could be drawn. In others on the other hand the examples were numerous and appear with tolerable [illegible] categories show if anything? That all the words used only once in Plato could fail to give valuable results can hardly be doubted by anyone. In the first place a study of them must reveal to some degree his love of variety. His famous ποικιλία must show itself in his continual change of words where others would have been content to repeat. In the absence of similar collections in other authors of the same period no comparison can be instituted. A collection of this kind to be of any value must be in an author of sufficient compass to show his capability. A large part of course are ἅπαξ λεγόμενα because there was no need of using them a second time. Language is for man, not man for language! If in a given dialogue or portion of a dialogue there is a high number of ἅπαξ λεγόμενα the subject matter must be correspondingly removed from the authors usual objects of meditation. A column giving the words appearing only in Plato would on general principles indicate a still more unusual attitude of mind. Besides the strangeness of attitude it would also represent how far the writer is successful in adopting or coining words. In general however this is only a more extreme development of the previous category. The use of Platonic vocabulary in succeeding writers is supposed to give an indication of how widely the writings were read in the time of Aristotle on. On the supposition that the writers of an represent their own period the relation of the popula of the different pieces could be discovered. We are aware that there are many other means through which a word could have reached following generations than that the dialogue in which Plato happens to have used it should have been read. Perhaps it was a technical word and thus it would have lived on in the [illegible] to that under current of speech which came into literature at a later period, or perhaps it was a happy coinage and by adoption into the current speech lived on unmindful of its parentage. Again, that may be if we find that our test gives a first position to the dialogues whose history we know, it is presumeably correct in the [illegible] little or nothing. This test of popularity is so delicate that extreme caution is necessary and we should not be prone to put much faith in an argument drawn from these occurrences must be corroborated by probability and historical evidence. In a like manner a column giving the poetical words that are quotation must afford an idea of the degree of quotation in the [illegible] And again a list of poetical words in the vocabulary of Plato would be another indication [illegible]

In the 26 dialogues whose vocabulary has been examined we [illegible] poetic words and the compounds with πρός and σύν there remain 3317 [illegible] This gives an average of 2.16 to the page. Naturally there is difference in the frequency of their appearance in the various dialogues. It has already been observed that the massing of these peculiarities in any place must denote unwonted [illegible] the author is in a new field where a rare vocabulary is called for. The creative power of imagination that calls forth the thought is paralleled by a corresponding richness of language. Believing that the following category is an index to the character and style of the dialogues I shall proceed to point out the agreement and apparent deviations.

[illegible] dimension, as might be expected [illegible] mean. The Critias and Timaeus treat of subjects [illegible] [illegible] of ordinary conversation. The one relates the story of the Egyptian priest dealing with the combat of the nations on either side of the island pillars of Hercules, the physical disasters, the island Atlantis and the [illegible], [illegible] the creation of the world. It is evident that these subjects so different from each other and from the rest of the dialogues must demand a new vocabulary. Each of these subjects must have a suitable range of language. In the Critias, the number of once used words is proportionally more than 2½ times as [illegible] the Republic. [illegible] that it is a fragment the complete dialogue is [illegible]. The Timaeus contains more than twice as large a proportion as the [illegible] under consideration that calls for this high range of imagery figures can be in the climax and the Timaeus. The first five pages according to the [illegible] have 1.6 such used words to the page. The next [illegible] pages treating of the island Atlantis show an average of 3.6 thus illustrating that a change of subject immediately effects a corresponding change of language. After this introduction comes the story of Timaeus on the creation of the world with an average 4.78 to the page.

description of the charms of country scenery and the digression on the mythology of the place gives an opportunity for employing a high proportion of new words. [illegible] of Lysias the number falls to the average of the lowest dialogues. It rises [illegible] the climax of the thought as Socrates unfolds the [illegible] finally falls to the Platonic average. [illegible] second speech of Socrates only the Platonic average the rest of the dialogue will fall in the average of [illegible]

Next to the Phaedrus but considerably lower we find the Politicus. The cause of this is more difficult to imagine. Excepting the short myth there is nothing in the whole course of the dialogue which suggests a comparison between it and the Critias, Timaeus or Phaedrus. The few pages in which the myth is told exhibits an average of 1.42 to the page. So the explanation must be found somewhere else. None of the dialogues are so technical. No less than [illegible] or occupations are designated by the adjectives in -ικος alone of the [illegible]. The verbs and nouns [illegible] author resorts to a great number of arts. If in the Cratylus we subtract the poetical words used for linguistic purposes the dialogue as a whole falls to the average of 2.160. To see how closely the [illegible] tally with the content we add the relation of the speeches in the Symposium [illegible] Pausanias 2., Eryximachus .66, Aristophanes 6.42, Agathon 4.66, Socrates (201d–12c) 1.43, Alcibiades 2.5.

[illegible] of the Speech of Agathon is largely due to poetical words. The compass of some of the smaller dialogues is too insignificant to give any [illegible] of the [illegible] some of the shorter dialogues there is no call for a strange vocabulary. The businesslike eagerness of the Gorgias has the same effect on style.

We pass to the words used in Plato alone–

Words occurring only in one author must be formed by the writer either for some special purpose and have failed to get into the current speech or they are so technical as not to occur anywhere else. A considerable number of course are ordinary words and their non-occurrence is nothing but a matter of accident. A portion is no doubt a part of the com- [illegible] into literary prose. This category so far agrees with the preceding that it shows the author searching for new ways of expressing what had not yet found expression. A high proportion shows the abnormal character of the pieces that fall outside of the average. Naturally enough we find the abstract Politicus and Sophistes at the head of this column. The nature of both is very much the same. They are both technical and abstruse. In their endless bisections and subdivisions they both plunge into numerous trades and occupations the technical vocabulary, though some of it may have been used in departments whose speech has not survived, appears in many instances to be made for the occasion and might have survived if there had been any practical need for any such beyond the metaphysical range of Plato's dialectics. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that the [illegible]. The argumentation is metaphysical and parallels are [illegible] huckstering, painting, grammar, music, and from [illegible]

The [illegible] of the Cratylus is more puzzling. The reason is the great number of words coined for etymological purposes. Socrates asserting that there is a natural propriety in names places words of every-day speech in juxtaposition with similar words coined to explain the existing words. ἀειθεήρ is coined to make clear the original force of αἰθήρ. ἀναστρωπή is supposed to have been the first form of ἀστραπή. In the same way he compares βουλαπτεροῦν and βλαβερόν, ἑρπνοῦν and τερπνόν, ἔσρος and ἔρως ψυσέχη and ψυχή etc. More than one third of the entire number consists of such formations. There are also occasional dialectic forms like ἐσσία and φαίης. The number [illegible] formations like ἐμποδιζοφάνως, ἐθελήμων and lumbering [illegible] due to the etymological feature of the piece the Crat[illegible] falls below the average. The position of the Critias, Timaeus, and Phaedrus need no comment. In the Laws the high proportion in certain portions is counteracted by the length of the entire work. The subjects of most of the dialogues that fall under the average explain their position. The easy familiarity or the earnest [illegible] Parmenides is last. But having a small number of [illegible] its undub. division is necessarily much smaller.

In order to treat in succession all the [illegible] relating to Style we shall turn to the poetic element.

Whatever may be the proper position of the Cratylus it is surely not the most poetic of the writings of Plato [illegible] this column would seem to indicate. We have already had occasion more than once to show that a high figure does not indicate the same characteristic in every dialogue. What was due to the logical subjects of the Timaeus was due in a large measure to dialectics in the Politicus. In the Phaedo the low figure which results from its calm and serene [illegible] is produced in the Gorgias by earnestness of purpose. And if it was necessary to illustrate this [illegible]ation any [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible]

of the [illegible]

But almost the entire number of poetic [illegible] of the dialogues is quoted to show the original [illegible] of words. ἀήτης is supposed to be connected with ἀήρ [illegible]

Here as before the Republic is the mean in the series of Plat[illegible] explain the place of the Gorgias and Phaedo. The Parmenides is too dry to contain much poetry. The broad humour and farcical characters of the Euthydemus would rather not allow any other poetry than that of parody. The effect of the dialectics of the Politicus is the same. Some dialogues are too short to indicate much. In the different parts of the Phaedrus the poetical vocabulary falls in the [illegible] position than we should justify on other grounds. But it has been found that subtracting a portion of the poetical language of Agathon the dialogue as a whole averages the same as the Republic. The speech of the young poet intended to be characteristic is flowery and highly ornamented. We now pass to the category indicating the popularity of the dialogues from the time of Aristotle on. To our knowledge they are not used earlier than Plato.

Some of these words doubtless belonged to the speech of the people and were first adopted by Plato. In other parts may have been employed in works no longer existing. But whether they were ennobled from the folkspeech or coined by Plato, he was at any rate considered by following generations an authority in language as well as in thought. Even [illegible] belong would have no hesitation when it came under the great name of Plato. A number of these words may have come into common speech in a great many other ways but it is to be presumed that those who use especially the philosophical language of Plato and words that are found nowhere else were acquainted with the dialogues in which they occur.

[illegible] it are grouped the Laws and the Phaedo. The Timaeus [illegible]

The Critias is more doubtful; but its novel interest and its close its close connection with the Timaeus [illegible] a similar popularity.

The great number of technical words of the Politicus [illegible] that those who use them had read this dialogue of [illegible] known by all peop[l]e who were acquainted with the [illegible] Galen must not necessarily have read this dialogue because he employs ἀκεστικός, nor does it follow that Aristotle has read it bec he uses πιλητικός. [illegible] with the Republic will explain its high position.

By a careful examination of the words in the Cratylus it appears that a portion of them belong to the class either adopted or coined by Plato and continued by [illegible] Sporadically also they come up in late writers like Herodian. The Cratylus is higher than its philosophi interest can warrant. But, if we recollect, that aside from its lively humor and irony this attempt to arrive at [illegible] in an age when neither Bopp nor Pott had seen the day, we can reconcile ourselves to what the figures seem to convey.

The popularity of the Phaedo was no doubt [illegible] great and we should expect to find it among the highest. But the range vocabulary is ordinary and [illegible] it was too serious for poetic flights. However widely it may have been read and however great an impression its thought may have made on following ages, its vocabulary being largely the same as the current language could of course leave no clearly perceptible mark on succeeding writers.

The same reasons more or less modified by the suggestions given previously will explain the order of most of the other dialogues. But how can we account for the [illegible] popularity of the [illegible] it occupies in our Scale? No doubt philosophers would object strenuously to the place it has received in our estimation. From some reason the Parmenides has so few ἅπαξ εἰρημένα that even if all had occurred in this line they could hardly have indicated the popularity [illegible] this dialogue [illegible].

The principle result arrived at by the grouping of our figures is the order of the dialogues [illegible] referring to Style. The Republic is the center about which all the others range themselves, more or less regularly. [illegible] Ion, Menexenus, and Parmenides partly from a feeling that [illegible] and partly from an interest to see how they compare with the other dialogues. Of these the [illegible] compares fairly well, the Ion less well and the Parmenides worst. This argument is not enough to exclude the [illegible] if it does not come from the hand of Plato, it is no wonder [illegible] of his vocabulary. It is simply a matter of careful otherwise [illegible] to make perfect [illegible] no authority and no remedy of the matters [illegible] extreme difficulty.
